I am pleased to announce that our community has surpassed the $1.4 billion barrier. Congratulations to all the community members that have contributed to this goal. Also, it is exciting that other communities are capitalizing on what we have created. We have very quickly formed collaborations with other communities and are creating a shared "Developer Community" for all to communicate. We will be creating a hub page with all of our communities news in one place and a place to store all of our top-down content. We have our first community member that has been on the Discord since the beginning. He is a coder, and we are proud of his dedication to our community. He recently added his own voting page to our subreddit. I am pleased to welcome him to the boards! If you see a member in the Discord, give them a warm welcome! Subreddit: Follow us on Twitter Masternode Documents We're also very excited that we've recently deployed 6 more masternodes. These new nodes will handle issue tracking and other important developer documentation and applications that are still in progress. We'd also like to thank our recent contributors! dVA, Telkibk, Akberovich, Yil zakharivska, and Digitalizatziya. Also, we have another round of masternodes available and we hope to see you all on the boards! Shoutouts I would like to thank Dan, "Z-toys" for some new wallpaper. He is a great community member and a very talented artist. I would also like to thank Voyper, for sharing his version of our logo. It is a great representation of what our community is about and I hope that we can grow this together! Thank you, fellow community members! Kotlin: autoMocking with method receiver Is there a way to autoMock using Kotlin when a method receiver is not the same object as the one mocked? The reason is I have an object from a service that I call from another class. The service may be asynchronous. When I do the following: val mockService
