

When you use an online tutorial for an application such as Photoshop, make sure to save your work regularly (save it often when you're experimenting), because you can lose your work if you forget to upload it. Many times you will lose part of an image if you save it in this way. I recommend that you always save your work in a folder that isn't on your hard drive and then upload it to your computer's hard drive later. Also remember to download any tutorials that are available online in case you want to revisit them later. If you're interested in learning Photoshop from the ground up, check out my book, Photoshop For Dummies (Wiley). If you're comfortable using another version of Photoshop, check out my book Mastering Photoshop (Wiley) for an introduction to Photoshop. I can't help but use the ubiquitous phrase "behind the photoshopping" in this chapter. What does "behind the photoshopping" mean? I would say that the purpose of the photoshopping is to alter the appearance of the image. But what is it you actually do when you alter an image? In fact, you use many different tools to alter an image. Depending on what you're doing, you use some of them more or less frequently. Here's a breakdown of some of the Photoshop tools you can use to alter the appearance of a photo: * Pencil tool: As shown in Figure 5-6, the pencil tool is often the first and most used tool to alter an image. If you're a beginner, the pencil tool is usually the tool you'll use most often. The pencil tool is a very good tool to use for small changes. It's perfect for changing the color of an object or creating a subtle correction. Pencil tools aren't perfect for correcting large areas of an image, but they're good for more localized changes. * Airbrush tool: This tool is best suited to altering an image in a way that's more subtle than the pencil tool, although for some minor photo correction, it's just as effective. An airbrush is a water-based paintbrush with a nozzle. You use this tool to "paint" your image with one or more colors. You can

Redox modulation of metalloenzymes. Redox modulation represents a promising strategy for rational drug design that can be exploited in several ways, including making some enzymes of therapeutic interest more or less effective in an oxidized, catalytically competent state. In the last five years, a number of agents have been developed that target specific regions on the surface of the heme-binding protein horseradish peroxidase to shift its redox properties to enhance its catalytic activity. Recent applications of this strategy include reversible inhibition of cytochrome c peroxidase and catalase, with the goal of either protecting cells from peroxidative damage or enhancing the effectiveness of chemotherapy by increasing intracellular peroxidase levels to aid in the destruction of cancerous cells. The Indigenous community of Lake St Clair and its surroundings are holding on to their chances of receiving more Olympic investments, despite the province's official investment committee's recommendation to cancel $1.4 billion worth of funding. More to come on this story as we learn more. The panel, made up of eight of Ontario's 15 cabinet ministers, met at Queen's Park Friday and recommended that an investment of $5.8 billion for the province's green and recreation infrastructure be discontinued. The $5.8 billion amounts to just $3,350 for each Ontarian. The committee found that the Ontario Liberals' infrastructure bank was not connected to communities and was not sustainable. The committee also found that the plan was too expensive, would be difficult to implement and that the private sector could do better. Tory spokesman Jeff Watson declined to comment on the committee's decision, though he said funding for a proposed $1.8 billion Indigenous Park at the former Lindsay Heavy Industries site was also on the table, but not recommended. Gord Dewar, a board member of the Toronto Region Conservation Authority, said the recommendation left the province with a choice to make: some of the money can go to repairing infrastructure in communities or it can go to a new project. "That is something I would suspect that the province will choose to do, and I think that will be good for the province, good for taxpayers," Dewar said. "I think we should be investing in the people and communities." Gord Dewar is a board member of the Toronto Region Conservation Authority. (Submitted by the Toronto Region Conservation Authority) Infrastructure bank may still get Indigenous funding
