Field of the Invention The present invention is generally related to microprocessors and, more particularly, to microprocessors having caches. 2. Related Art Caches are commonly used in microprocessors to increase the speed with which memory accesses can be performed. In one type of microprocessor configuration, a processor core and a cache memory are used in a cache coherency protocol (CPC) to ensure that the data in the cache are coherent with the data in memory. One such type of CPC architecture is a shared bus architecture in which a single cache line is accessible in a coherent manner by the processor core, memory bus and/or graphics bus. In such a shared bus architecture, typically, the cache line is composed of a number of memory locations, or words, that are read and writeable by the processor core and that are readable by the graphics bus. In a shared bus architecture, the cache line is typically smaller than a memory location in the memory. A memory controller in the shared bus architecture is responsible for maintaining the coherency between the memory locations in the cache and the memory locations in the memory. Typically, as known to those skilled in the art, the sizes of the caches are integral multiples of a certain cache line size. Accordingly, the sizes of the caches are typically predetermined. Typically, the cache line size is determined based on the page size of the memory locations in the memory. In some architectures, a variable size cache can be used by a processor core. As known to those skilled in the art, the size of the variable size cache can be selected or set by the processor core. As technology continues to advance, it is desired to be able to utilize microprocessors having variable size caches for certain applications. In other words, it is desired to utilize caches having sizes that vary with respect to fixed size cache lines. However, when variable size caches are utilized in a shared bus architecture, a single cache
