The annual risk of human infection with human and animal-transmissible diseases is influenced by the extent of contact between people and wildlife and the relative prevalence of these diseases in wildlife. Wildlife density is likely a more relevant factor for spillover of infectious disease into humans than wildlife species diversity. While swine have become the most widely accepted reservoir for diseases shared with humans, another option is to consider a range of wildlife to be potential hosts for zoonoses, as we observed in the present study. Our preliminary survey of feline, canine, and avian populations from rural areas of the southeastern U.S., in addition to feral swine, was designed to test for the presence of transmissible agents. Based on PCR primers for sequence-characterized repetitive elements that amplify across a range of hosts, we found at least one sample with sequences homologous to pathogens carried by humans and animals. A total of 92 samples were collected from feral swine, eight from feral cats, 20 from dogs, four from mockingbirds, and four from turkey vultures (Chaetura) within the mid-Atlantic region of the U.S. No transmissible disease agents were found in a subsample of 38 turkey vulture samples, which included the four samples with virus sequences. Three of the four sequences were similar to viruses carried by human blood donors in the U.S., and one sequence matched a strain from a patient with hepatitis E in England. This preliminary survey suggests that wildlife may be a source of pathogens carried by people, particularly in areas where domestic swine are not a significant threat to human health. Future studies should focus on determining the relative importance of wildlife as a reservoir for human infections.
